Twitter user Matt S. was able to use Apple Pay on Sheetz, a gas and convenience chain with over 500 stores in mostly Mid-Atlantic states next to Raleigh-Durham International Airport. Sheetz has not publicly confirmed that it is common to launch Apple Pay at the gas pump, but many of its locations are equipped with the necessary contactless payments infrastructure to tap an iPhone or Apple Watch. QuikTrip, another U.S. chain of over 730 gas and convenience stores in the Midwest and southern U.S., has also supported Apple Pay and other contactless payments since February, with all locations coming on board in the past few weeks. QuikTrip does not seem to accept Apple Pay directly at their gas pumps at this time. QuikTrip began managing Apple Pay earlier this year (Image: Ian M. via Twitter) Sheetz and QuikTrip were both previously committed to the Merchant Customer Exchange (MCX) and its indefinite deferred Apple Pay rival CurrentC. Sheetz and QuikTrip join a handful of other former MCX members who now accept Apple Pay, including high-profile retailers Best Buy and Rite Aid. Apple Pay holdouts Walmart and Target also belonged to MCX, but the previously released Walmart Pay and the latter is developing its own similar QR code-based solution. Update: Former MCX member CVS also appears to be testing Apple Pay support at contactless payment terminals at select U.S. stores. The pharmacy chain's official position is that it is in the process of evaluating mobile payment options for our customers, a chain of gasoline and convenience stops, just completed a pilot program for an NFC mobile payment method. Payment method. Drivers used their Sheetz Fleet Business Advantage cards loaded on their NFC-enabled mobile phones to make purchases of fuel and convenience at Sheetz locations. NFC mobile payment pilot was developed by Wright Express. The mobile phone will eventually become the main computing device in the near future, said Russ Lamer, head of new technologies at Wright Express, Salt Lake City, UT. It will be used for everything, including our wallets. Why carry a regular wallet when you can get it in your phone – a genuine multifunction electronic device, he said. It will be used to store your debit cards, receive and redeem coupons, pay bills from your phone and more. The mobile phone becomes a very convenient device. Sheetz is a family owned and operated chain of gas and convenience locations, with 350 branches throughout New England. Drivers who participated in the test drive in several cities approved the energy station chain's NFC mobile payment method as easy, fast and convenient. Interviews with participating fleet drivers showed that they preferred to pay for purchases with their mobile phones, as many reported that they always carried a phone but often forget their wallet. Most of the drivers felt the technology was fun and wished they had NFC technology in their own phones, he said. Sheetz's new NFC mobile payment method allowed drivers to make cell phone purchases both inside the store and at the pump. The success of this lawsuit suggests that these kinds of NFC-enabled mobile payment methods are an area with great potential for mobile commerce. The company collects and combines transaction information from its network with analytical tools that help fleets manage their vehicles more efficiently. The success of Sheetz's NFC trial demonstrates the security, convenience and potential for growth in mobile payments. The challenge will be the merchants installing contactless readers on their many sites and commercializing NFC phones, making them affordable for the market and getting enough shoppers to install readers at their fueling and convenience store locations. Mr. Lamer said. This will take some time, but demand will eventually drive acceptance, he said.
